

Brains as Clear as Jell-O for Scientists to Explore

The visible brain has arrived — the consistency of Jell-O, as transparent and colorful as a child’s model, but vastly more useful.

Scientists at Stanford University reported on Wednesday that they have made a whole mouse brain, and part of a human brain, transparent so that networks of neurons that receive and send information can be highlighted in stunning color and viewed in all their three-dimensional complexity without slicing up the organ.

When you’re about to be asleep, you remember the randomest things..

your ex
your ex ex
your ex ex ex...
fights with friends
when you did the dumbest things and many more!

There is a common term used in Korea called “ ” which literally means kick blankets. It is used for a situation when someone is going to sleep and suddenly remembers an embarrassing moment then he or she kicks the blanket unconsciously due to shame or regret. Similar to the concept of To Do List, I created a notepad that you can write down moments you want to forget about. Whether you bury or burn the note is up to the user.

According to an article I read, scientists had found a brain that is transparent as Jell-O so that networks of neurons that receive and send information can be highlighted in stunning color and viewed in all their three-dimensional complexity without slicing up the organ.

Visceral

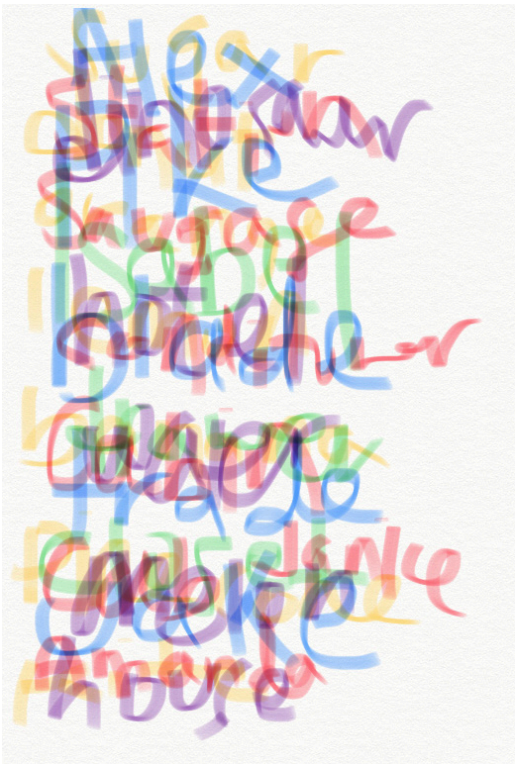

when you are about to be asleep, you remember things with:
surprise
shock
panic
embarrassment
regret

Behavioral

visual interpretation/ affect can be interactive with the audience materials prepared for in use

Reflective

cultural background of the term juxtaposes the common use of notes

When you get in bed and remember something that happened 7 years ago and what u could've done to prevent it.

When you're finally going to sleep but you remember that awkward moment you had in 2012
